HOW SERPENTS CRAWL WITHOUT LEGS. THE CAUSE EXPLAINED .- Although deprived of feet, fins and other obvious members for walking, the serpent glides on the earth, ascends trees, or even directs its course through the water, with surprising agility, and with graceful evolutions; yet the serpent was "cursed above every beast of the field," and man, as if remembering the curse, turns from the reptile with disgust and horror, or seeks to effect its instant destruction. Let us examine how all this is effected; and first as to the spinal column.

The numerous bones or vertebræ which form this chain, are united together by ball socket articulations; or, in other words, the rounded head of each is fitted into a cup like cavity in its predecessor, so that the whole column is a chain of these joints capable of the utmost mobility compatible with the safety of the spinal cord enclosed within. The articulations can only be moved from side to side, and their progress by vertical undulations, as in many old prints of serpents, is anatomically impossi-

So also it is impossible for the snake to perform the feat which has been ascribed to him, when he wishes to go quickly down the hill, for, according to an absurd story, he is said to put his tail in his mouth, and 200,000 roll himself down, being in the form of a $335,760 hoop. It is just as well to recollect the fact Whole Tickets $10; Halres $5; Quarters $2.50. that a snake cannot turn himself directly upwards when held by the tail. He can wriggle famously from side to side, but certainly not upwards. Hence it follows that the best way to handle a snake is to hold him out at arm's length; in this position he can do

But how, it will be asked, does the snake continue to get along on the ground so fast, as he has no perceptible legs or arms to help him? This is managed as follows;—To each vertebræ-and a large snake has many sioners : the Prize being placed against the Number | dozen vertebra-is attached a pair of ribs the small end of those ribs are not attached to a sternum or breastbone, as in man, but to a single scutum or scale on the abdomen by means of a slender cartilage and a set of short muscles. It is on the points of these ribs, which may be compared to the legs of a millipede, that the snake rests, and they act in progressive order, just like the legs of that creature, each pair bringing forward the plate or scutum to which it is attached .-This row of scuta may thus be regarded as one ample foot. Sir E. Home, in his "Comparative Anatomy," gives an account of the muscles which, arising from the ribs, give motion to the scuta. He observes, that the rib in the snake performs two functions; the upper half is c ncerned in respiration, the lower n locomotion.

If a snake be allowed quietly to crawl over the hand, the progressive movement of the ribs may be easily distinguished; and also if it be watched, while crawling over any raised edge (as the back of a book) requiring the firm application of two or three scuta in succession, as the body glides over

If you put a snake on a bit of plate-glass he can get no hold with the scuta, and be comes powerless.

Suakes are often in the habit of climbing gravings, particularly in old pictorial Bibles where the serpent is seen tempting Adam and Eve, and in stuffed specimens in museums, as coiling their bodies round the branches, in cork-screw-like folds. Now the snake (when alive) never does this; it simply glides up, the whole body extended in a straight line, clinging by means of the tip of expanded ribs, with the scuta attached, as has been explained. Mr. Gross tells us that "the black snake in Jamaica will allow the greatest part of his body to hang in the air and thus remain still while little more than the tail retains its position by clinging (straight not spirally, and not half round it but longitudinally along it) to the upper sur-face of a branch; and it will often pass freely and gracefully from one branch to another at a considerable interval, projecting its head and body with the utmost care across the interval." The motions of a snake in a tree are beautifully easy and free, and convey the impression that the reptile feels quite at home among the branches .- Buckland's Curiosities of Natural History.
